Dear Heidi Euzger,

Please could you respond to my question below in the email below.

In the meantime, I have this link which suggests that the building is protected as the property has been left empty for a considerable amount of time by the owner.

Dear Heidi Euzger,

Thank you for your informative answer. I was unaware you could knock a property down without any replacement plans in place.

I do have concerns this is a backdoor approach to building another faceless block of flats. If the owner can't get the planning permissions desired, can they leave the site empty and boarded-up indefinitely?

Regards,
Cllr. David Longstaff

Dear Cllr Longstaff,

I refer to your recent enquiry concerning the demolition of the locally listed building at the above site. Locally listed buildings (other than those in a conservation area) do not enjoy statutory protection; thus their demolition except in a conservation area is permitted development under Part 11 of Schedule 2 of the General Permitted Development Order (GPDO). Demolition under part 11 is subject to the conditions specified under paragraph B2, including a requirement to make a prior approval application to the local planning authority (LPA). The LPA's role in dealing with such an application is confined to requiring details of the method of demolition, site clearance etc....

The applicant as you are aware has submitted an application under the prior approval process which is currently under determination.

I trust the above is of assistance.

Kind Regards,
Heidi
